The Daily Quote

"In that case, lawmakers from both parties say pressure from Republicans alarmed about the broad political consequences of inaction [on comprehensive immigration reform] could mount on House Republican leaders to move toward the Senate's position — or even take up the Senate bill without changes. That dynamic has played out twice this year. In January, House Democrats — with a minority of House Republicans — passed a Senate-White House compromise to avert massive tax increases and sudden across-the-board spending cuts, after House Republicans sunk the speaker's more conservative version of the legislation. In February, a Republican version of the Violence Against Women Act crashed on the House floor, prompting Republican leaders to allow the House to pass the Senate's version — again relying on a majority of Democratic votes."
